

California Consumer Privacy Act

Third-Party Disclosures for Site Visitors

Third-Party Disclosures for Site Visitors

If you have never been a Quicken customer, but you have visited the Quicken.com website in the past year, Quicken may have disclosed the following to our partners:

Categories of personal information Quicken has disclosed for business purpose in the last year	Categories of third parties to whom the personal information has been disclosed
Identifiers – Specifically, your IP Address.	Analytics: We may have disclosed your IP Address to partners who provide analytics services to us - for example, to tell us how you use our website so that we may improve your experience.
Internet or other electronic network activity information – for example, your browsing history, and information regarding your interaction with the Quicken.com website	Analytics: We may have disclosed your Internet activity to partners who provide analytics services to us - for example, to tell us how you use our website so that we may improve your experience.

Categories of personal information Quicken has sold in the last year	Categories of third parties to whom the personal information has been sold
Identifiers – Specifically, your IP Address. Quicken values the privacy of our customers and the confidentiality of their information. The CCPA has modified certain instances of IP-Address sharing and re-categorized them as selling. Please refer to the right column for a detailed explanation of when this occurs.	Advertising: If you have not opted-out of the sale of your information, and you visited certain pages on the Quicken.com website in the past year, we may have released your IP address to our advertising partners. IP addresses may be used to tailor advertising to a consumer’s interest. They may also be used to turn off advertising for existing customers.

Dec 15, 2019